The article we read on this course contains the following sentence, which deeply impressed me a lot:

"Image is everything. Now Crossberg and Peterson must confront something far more terrifying than humiliation: the prospect of death row."

Yet it’s quiet true that perhaps each of us may have the thought to conceal the wrong doing things we have done. In my opinion, it’s of human nature for people to do so. Not all of us are sages, and even the God may make some mistakes. There is no one could live his life all over without errors along as regrets.

But just a few people have realized the idea I mentioned above and always trying to hide their faults. In order to keep their well images in front of others, they would rather run the risk of making the situation even much more tougher than share their helplessness. How unwise they are!

It’s not the end of the world no matter how serious mistakes you have made. Because all your friends, families, and acquaintances will forgive you. They will be the last ones who laught at you, regardless of your helplessness and bewilderment. On the contrary, they will encourage you, seeing you through the toughness - as long as you tell them that you are really in need of help, and how the circumstances are.

Do remember that there is no error could not be forgiven, even the law will give you a chance to make up for it. NEVER act like the roles in this news report. There is always another way - another better way to salve the question.
